ENCYCLOPEDIA OF
THE REFORMED FAITH

Donald K. McKim, Editor
David F. Wright, Consulting Editor

Westminster/John Knox Press
Louisville, Kentucky

Saint Andrew Press
Edinburgh
Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.

Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.

Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.

Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.

Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.

Revelation

of the Spirit in the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2:20, 33; Col. 2:13). The ascension of Christ (John 12:23-24) was also a significant event in the life of Christ, both for the Jewish believers and for the Gentiles who came to faith in Christ. The ascension marked the end of Christ's earthly ministry and the beginning of the spiritual ministry of the Holy Spirit. The ascension of Christ is also significant in the development of church doctrine, particularly in the beliefs about the Holy Spirit and the nature of the resurrection of the body.